State-Wide Election Results

Just as the polls were indicating, we saw a huge swing in Ohio towards the Democratic Party. At the top of the ticket, Amy Acton (D) won the Ohio governorship over Vivek Ramswamy (R) by around 6 points. Additionally, Sherrod Brown (D) won Ohio's seat in the United States Senate over Jon Husted (R) by around 5 points.

In the U.S. House of Representatives, Democrats and Republicans have both won 7 seats so far, with 1 race still too close to call. That race is in Ohio's District 10, which encompasses Montgomery County, Greene County, and part of Clark County. Kristina Knickerbocker (D) currently holds a slight lead in that race.

Moving down the ballot, of the 17 State Senator positions up for election, 8 have gone to Democrats, while 9 have gone to Republicans. Before this election Republicans held a majority in the state senate, filling 23 of the 33 seats. Post election, they will hold 22 of the 33 seats.

Additionally, Republicans retained control of the State House but lost their super majority of 65 seats. They currently lead with 52 seats, compared to the Democrat's 39, with 7 races too close to call.

In Ohio's Attorney General race, John J. Kulewicz (D) currently holds a small lead over Keith Faber (R), however, that race remains too close to call. Democrats also hold a lead in the race for State Treasurer, which remains too close to call.

In the race for Ohio's Secretary of State, Allison Russo (D) defeated Robert Sprague.

Frank LaRose (R) currently holds a slight lead over Annette Blackwell (D) in Ohio's race for State Auditor.

National Election Results

National results reflected much of what we saw in Ohio, with Democrats flipping many key states.

As of this moment, Democrats have already captured a majority in the United States Senate with a 54-44 lead, while two races remain too close to call in Mississippi and Alaska.

Additionally, Democrats will hold a majority in the U.S. House of Representatives. They have already won 228 seats compared to the Republicans 139, while 68 seats remain to close to call.

For the first time in 16 years, Democrats also control the majority of state governorships. They currently have a 28-20 lead, with two races still being too close to call in Alaska and Kansas.
